FRONT MATTER

Syllabus

The formal syllabus in the Examination Decrees and Regulations states that this paper consists of:

The study of the social basis of political competition (including social cleavages and identities), social and political attitudes (including political culture), processes of political engagement and competition (including elections, protest politics and the mass media), the social basis for the formation, change, and maintenance of political institutions (including democracy and welfare states).

(Examination Decrees and Regulations)

Content and Structure

This final honour school paper focuses on the political attitudes, values and behaviour of people in different societies. Students will study the politicization of social cleavages (divisions) such as class, race and ethnicity, gender, religion, and nationality; changing social values and attitudes, including the impact of the media; political engagement and participation (such as turnout and protest politics); and how people influence the institutional structure through revolutions and civil wars and also, in stable democracies, welfare states. The course builds on some of the concepts, theories and knowledge introduced in the Politics Prelims syllabus — notably the study of representation, electorates, parties, civil society, who rules in a democracy, public policy and the politics of instability. But there is no need for students to have studied these topics for Prelims, and those that have not will not be at a disadvantage. The paper is empirical, but includes positive (as opposed to normative) theory, i.e. theories that aim to explain why people behave as they do. The aim of each topic is to assess the evidence for competing explanations of particular features of social and political life. The paper largely deals with contemporary societies and recent developments, but appreciation of historical developments is often necessary to understand these. The paper is also comparative, with the readings drawn from research on countries across the world, but most frequently on Western Europe and North America. Many of the readings involve comparisons of many countries and there is no need to show detailed knowledge of particular countries, as opposed to broad cross-national patterns and trends.

Objectives

1. Students should acquire an understanding of recent social and political science explanations of political processes and events.
2. Students should be able to relate this theoretical understanding to empirical data and analyses for more than two major industrial countries.
3. Students should acquire a grasp of the competing approaches in the field.
4. Students should gain understanding of the main methods of data collection and analysis in political science and sociology.
5. Students should gain an appreciation of the roles of models and theories in social scientific knowledge.
6. Students should become familiar with major features of contemporary societies that are relevant to politics, especially for developed democracies.

Teaching for the Course

Core lectures for this course are given in Michaelmas and Hilary Terms each academic year. It is essential that students attend as they provide an indispensable guide to the field, together with presentation of the latest theories and findings.

Students studying this paper will have eight tutorials, which will be organised by their college tutor, and conducted by one of the department members who teach this course or an approved graduate student or other person. In consultation with your tutor you should select a range of topics that prepare you adequately for the examination. Students normally write six essays over the course of a term of eight tutorials.

Quantitative Methods

Students taking this paper must attend and complete an assignment for the second-year quantitative methods course. That course should be helpful for students studying Political Sociology.

Course Assessment

The course is assessed by means of a three-hour unseen examination according to the provisions established in the Examination Decrees and Regulations. Examiners will be looking for a clear grasp of the competing theoretical arguments regarding the phenomena being studied; for an ability to assess evidence for, and against, these theories; for good knowledge of relevant research across a range of countries; for a grasp of the basics of social scientific data collection and analysis, especially survey data analysis; for the ability to engage in the clear analysis of concepts; and for an understanding of the nature of explanation in social science.

Reading list

The readings for each topic comprise a mixture of older and often seminal pieces, together with contemporary research. Most of the items are articles from the top sociology and political science peer-reviewed research journals. These sometimes employ complicated statistical methods. It is understood that students studying this paper have not necessarily had the substantial training in statistics necessary to fully appreciate the most sophisticated methodology. Even though you are not expected to be able to comprehend the details of the analysis, an intuitive understanding of key statistical concepts and principles of causal inference are important. Students with little knowledge of statistics, and even anxiety about mathematics, usually find that they pick up the main ideas and engage with the material effectively. Prior lack of statistical knowledge or enthusiasm for maths should not put you off from taking this paper. It is also worth noting that students are not expected to remember numbers and quote them in exams. The empirical knowledge that is required for exams regards the strength of the evidence for causal relationships in particular directions.

It is worthwhile discussing with your tutor how to read journal articles efficiently. Most articles are arranged in a traditional scientific format with an abstract, introduction, theory and literature review, data, methodology, results and concluding discussion sections. It is often possible to learn the main theoretical and empirical contributions of research by reading the front material and the conclusion, while just skimming the data, methodology and results sections. The literature reviews are often very helpful for understanding how other pieces on the reading list relate to each other and for expanding your knowledge of the literature beyond the reading list. The best students for this paper often follow up references not on the list and search for additional material.

The most recent articles usually have the most comprehensive and up to date literature reviews. Some topics include purely review articles. All the articles from the Annual Review of ... journals are literature reviews, albeit sometimes with additional analysis. Take care to note that different articles often talk past each other and they can differ, sometimes subtly, in their definitions of key concepts (e.g. for political culture).

The abstracts are usually very helpful summaries of articles. Whereas in other subjects it is sometimes better to read one or two pieces very thoroughly, with Political Sociology it is more often useful to get a broad overview of the topic before going into greater depth. A good strategy for this is to start by reading all the abstracts for all the articles on the list and skimming the books. This should give you both a good idea of the range of issues in the topic and help you start to identify the most relevant material for your essay question. Note that not all the material will be relevant for any particular essay question and that exam questions can require knowledge of material that is much less relevant for the tutorial essay questions on this list.

1. INTRODUCTORY READING

Regarding the list below, Clark, Golder and Golder is a key text for the Prelims course. It provides excellent theoretical and substantive background material as well as chapters and sections directly relevant to particular topics. It is worth reading cover to cover. The Crouch book is listed because it has very useful chapters on different social cleavages (class, gender, ethnicity, religion) and how these vary in different countries and how they changed from c.1960s to c.1990s. This is very important background material for these topics. Together with Clark et al., the Dalton book is perhaps the closest thing to a course textbook, but it is relatively superficial, it does not cover several of the topics and there are profound disagreements with some of the other research. You should read the whole book to get an important overview. Although they are not separately listed, relevant chapters of Crouch and Dalton should be considered part of the reading lists for the separate topics below.

The Orum and Dale books provides intellectual history for the study of political sociology and sets out some broader intellectual narratives and questions. These sometimes come from a different intellectual approach from this course, which focuses on testable theories. The two Annual Review pieces provide helpful theoretical background and research results that span a number of topics. The two Fukuyama books represent an analysis of historical social and political development which usefully provide context for and summaries of much contemporary political sociology.

Kellstedt and Whitten is a very readable primer on quantitative methodology for political science. It is a core text for Prelims. King, Keohane and Verba is a staple of graduate research training and is very helpful for further understanding the methodological approach that the vast majority of the readings on this course take.
